Washington, DC: A poll released today by the Health Coalition on Liability and Access (HCLA) reveals that South Carolinians believe the health care liability system is deeply flawed and needs reform. By an overwhelming margin (78 percent), the residents of South Carolina say their ability to get the health care they need is threatened by rising medical liability costs. Nearly six in ten (61 percent) believe their representatives in Congress should address this problem by enacting comprehensive reform of the medical liability system.

More than three-quarters of those polled (79 percent) support reforms that include common-sense limits on payments for non-economic damages, while at the same time ensuring that injured patients receive full payment for lost wages and medical expenses. Seventy-three percent support limits on the amount of money a trial lawyer can receive from a malpractice settlement or award.

A similar majority (72 percent) believe medical liability lawsuits are one of the primary reasons health care costs are rising across the board. Nearly six in ten (59 percent) of the South Carolina residents polled believe the number of medical liability lawsuits is higher than is justified, versus only 5 percent that say it is lower than is justified.

Christian Shalgian, Chairman of the HCLA said, "Every day in South Carolina, patients are suffering because the medical liability lottery has forced good doctors out of the practice of medicine. The problem isn't confined to just one state – people all over the nation are facing the loss of access to affordable, quality health care as a result of the crisis. A nationwide poll conducted for the HCLA in April 2004 found the same high level of concern about the medical liability crisis – and the same overwhelming support for common-sense reforms."

"In South Carolina and in many states across the country, the health care liability crisis is getting worse – and the time for action is long overdue," Shalgian said.

The poll of South Carolina residents was conducted in September 2004 for the Health Coalition on Liability and Access by Mason-Dixon Polling and Research. The margin for error is plus or minus 5 percent.

The results demonstrate that most South Carolinians believe:

Access to Quality Health Care is At-Risk: More than three quarters (78 percent) of the South Carolinians surveyed believe that the availability and quality of the health care they receive is affected because doctors are being forced out of medicine by the rising cost of medical liability coverage.

Cost of Health Care Rising Due to Excessive Litigation: More than seven out of ten (72 percent) of the people surveyed said that lawsuits are one of the main reasons why health care costs are rising.

Too Many Frivolous Lawsuits: The high number of medical liability lawsuits is unjustified, according to 59 percent of the survey respondents. Only 5 percent say that the number of lawsuits against health care providers is lower than justified.

Common-Sense Reforms Are Needed: A large majority of South Carolinians (61 percent) want their representatives in Congress to support reforms to fix the medical liability crisis. Seventy-nine percent favor a law that guarantees full payment for lost wages and medical expenses but limits non-economic damages; 73 percent want to limit the amount of money personal injury trial lawyers can get from settlements and awards their clients receive.
